MARKET UPDATE

Conversations continue to be dominated by the technology story, although this year has brought emerging markets firmly into the conversation (particularly TSMC, SK Hynix and Samsung), and how sustainable the continued rally is. Looking at valuations with a glass half full approach, they look much more reasonable than they did 12 months ago. This doesn't suggest a 2000 style price drop is imminent, arguably the melt up is still to happen, but this does direct our attention to earnings and whether the lofty expectations baked into the current prices are achievable. Tech stocks will not give us the answer to this. Instead, we look at sectors such as Healthcare, Manufacturing and Financials to see how heavily AI is being adopted and more importantly, whether it is increasing IRR.

Portfolio positioning remains balanced, with a value bias in Japan, tactically increasing exposure to emerging markets (more recently equity but bonds now looking more attractive despite the headwind of a stronger dollar) and a barbell in the US of tech exposure and equal weighted. The latter has seen the benefits of a healthy equity rotation over the last month or so and has historically proven to weather a selloff in tech well.

Gold remains a key diversifier across portfolios, albeit on a reduced exposure than we had in 2025 after taking profits in Q1. The yellow metal has struggled over the last 6 weeks or so with a stronger dollar and a more hawkish Fed rhetoric halting its progress. Central banks seem to be modest net buyers again at this level, after some sold to stabilise their currency, helping to create a floor on the price. We shouldn't expect the same returns as 2025 delivered, but as inflation expectations start to dissipate and the structural trend of a weaker dollar restarts, gold should gain interest once again.
